With the development of transportation, food are able to be consumed by travelling thousands of miles from farms. Some people think that we should only eat locally produced food to protect our environment and economy, I strongly hold the view that the disadvantages outweight the advantages.

There is no doubt that people benefit from eating local food. Firstly, the foods that provided by local businesses are fresher, because people can buy vegetables or meet after they are produced in a short time. Secondly, consumin local food can improve local economy and reduce the pollution of long-distance transport. However, local markets are not able provide all kinds of foods for local citizens, so it is important for people to consume non-local food as well.

Although it cost some time and resource to carry food far away from farms to consumers, the advantages out weight the disadvantages. Keeping a balanced diet requires many kinds of food to provide enough nutrients. Therefore, people may face health problems without the help of food that carried from other areas. Additionally, people can have more choices and are able to access high quality food, which may prompt the growth of local economy actually. What's more, governments can improve the environment with more funding as well.

To sum up, I completely think that the disadvantages of only eating locally produced food outweight the advantages, and we are supposed to consume different kinds of foods to improve our life practically.

有些人认为，富裕国家应该向贫穷国家提供除资金援助以外的其他形式的帮助。你在多大程度上同意或不同意这个观点？

Original Essay

Band 5.5

Many countries are still in poverty, and some people think richer countries should provide them with other types of help rather than financial aid. I strongly agree that the other types of help should be provided for poorer countries.

The financial aid exactly helps poor countries to some extent, which is also the direct help for them. On the one hand, the funding can be used by governments to invest in public facilities and service, so that improve the quality of citizens' lives. On the other hand, the poorer countries can use the financial aid to buy more resources that they need to support enough resources such as food, ore and petrol. However, only the financial plays a limited role in other aspects, which are the bottlenecks of the development.

The management, education and technique are also high demand for a country's development, and can not be solved just by money. The better education can help the country to own more highly qualified people, so that these locals can develop their countries by themselves. What's more, an ordered environment can help a country to improve effectively, which needs a better management system to run. Additionally, there is no doubt that technique and science can help poorer countries to improve producitity dramitically.

Overall, I completely hold the view that rich countries should provide poorer countries with other types of help rather than financial aid to help them improve in a better way.

Corrected Essay

Band 7.5

Many countries are still living in poverty, and some people believe that richer countries should provide poorer nations with other forms of assistance rather than simply offering financial aid. I strongly agree that non-financial support should play a more important role in helping developing countries.

Financial aid certainly helps poor countries to some extent and can provide immediate support for urgent problems. On the one hand, funding can be used by governments to invest in public facilities and public services, thereby improving the quality of citizens' lives. On the other hand, poorer countries can use financial assistance to purchase essential resources such as food, fuel, and raw materials. However, financial aid alone plays only a limited role in solving the deeper problems that restrict long-term national development.

Education, management systems, and technological support are also in high demand for a country's development and cannot be addressed simply through money. Better education systems can help countries develop more highly qualified professionals, enabling local people to improve their nations independently. Moreover, a stable and well-organized society requires effective management systems and government administration. Additionally, there is no doubt that advanced technology and scientific knowledge can help poorer countries improve productivity dramatically and strengthen their economies in the long run.

Overall, I completely agree that rich countries should provide poorer countries with other forms of assistance in addition to financial aid, because this approach can help them achieve sustainable development more effectively.

- Body 2: the behaviour draws the attention to problems, which makes more people pay attention to international issues
- Summary: I strongly hold the view that famous people's support plays an important in addressing international issues

Answer

Many celebrities actively support international aid organizations through social media and public campaigns. While some people argue that celebrity involvement can distract attention from serious global issues, I believe that it is an effective way to raise public awareness and encourage support for these causes.

Some people believe that celebrities make international problems seem less important. One reason is that media coverage often focuses more on the celebrity than on the issue itself. As a result, the public may pay more attention to a famous person's appearance, lifestyle, or personal opinions than to the humanitarian crisis being discussed. Moreover, complex international problems may be oversimplified when they are presented through social media posts. Consequently, people may fail to understand the seriousness and complexity of these issues.

However, I strongly believe that celebrity support plays a valuable role in drawing attention to international problems. Famous people often have millions of followers and enjoy significant influence over the public. Their involvement can help spread information about issues that many people would otherwise ignore. Furthermore, celebrity campaigns can encourage people to donate money, volunteer their time, or support charitable projects. As a result, celebrity involvement not only raises awareness but also generates practical assistance for those in need. In many cases, international aid organizations receive greater public attention and resources because of celebrity endorsements.

In conclusion, although celebrity involvement may sometimes shift attention away from the issues themselves, I believe that the advantages outweigh the disadvantages. Their influence can significantly increase public awareness, encourage public participation, and provide valuable support for international aid organizations in addressing global challenges.
